The Logical Magic Of Change

As a simple example, consider the rate of change, or "speed" of an automobile. Speed is a function of how much ground the vehicle covers in a certain amount of time (e.g., 10 miles per hour). Thus, speed is the relationship between distance and time. The car's velocity in moving from the garage to the highway can be said to be at a different level than a car, garage, highway, or clock, because it is a property of the relationship between them (and does not exist without them).

Consider the power of one word alone. A single magical word can not only change something's meaning, it can convince someone to change how they think. In 1974, an experiment was conducted in which people were asked to recall what they'd seen in a car crash video. Some were asked if they'd seen "the" broken headlight and some if they'd seen "a" broken headlight.
